Currently, food in the UK is regulated in a similar way to in the European Union (EU). However, there could be more differences in the future if the EU or the UK decide to change their regulations.

Different regulations could also apply in different parts of the UK, if Northern Ireland continue to follow EU regulations, while England, Wales and Scotland follow UK regulations.

[IMAGE slushie_jpg] Slush-ice drinks, also known as slushies, are frozen drinks made from flavoured ice.

Government advice recommends slush-ice drinks are not sold to children aged four and under. Additionally, the advice states that children under ten should not be offered free refills. This is because the sweetener (glycerol) can cause headaches and sickness.

Question type: Text

Cell-cultivated products are foods made without slaughter or traditional farming. For example, cells from animals are grown in a controlled setting and then used to create the final product. Cell-cultivated products produced from animal cells can also be known as lab-grown meat or cell-cultivated meat.

Cell-cultivated products for human consumption are not yet on the market in the UK. Any product would need to go through a safety assessment before it was authorised to be sold. The following questions are to better understand your views about cell-cultivated products, particularly cell-cultivated meat.
